First, I should acknowledge the support of the International Visegrad Fund whose financial contribution enabled publication of this book. I would also like to thank the partners of this project: Attila Havas, Milan Sikula (Head of the Institute of Economic Research, Slovak Academy of Sciences) and, particularly, Anna Kaderabkova whose invaluable engagement resulted in enrichment of the book with the papers of prolific authors.

Moreover, I would like to thank the School of Slavonic and East European Studies of the University College London where I had the post-doc fellowship, which gave me a chance to meet some good economists of the field (some of whom are the contributors to this book). Special thanks should go to Tomasz Mickiewicz for his direct help to me in different forms, as well as to Slavo Radosevic for his merit supervision over my whole stay in London. He inspired my present interests with innovation (not mentioning the knowledge economy).

What is more, I would like to give credit to the authors of the book who cooperated very eagerly. Thanks to them, the process of preparation of the book was so quick. I especially appreciate the cooperation with the authors I have not met so far – thank you for the trust and a strong belief that your engagement in this project is worthwhile.

A number of other persons contributed to the publication of this book. I would like to thank Ewa Okoń-Horodyńska who especially supports the development of the Knowledge & Innovation Institute. Some authors have joined this project thanks to the conference, which we organised in Cracow (January 2007). I would also like to thank Maryla Stadnik and Joanna Osińska who smoothly handled editorial issues and helped much with the coordination of the project and with the entire communication processes.
